Cayden has been fighting brain cancer for nearly 10 years. Cayden was at a Husker basketball game and was having a hard time walking in a straight line. His parents immediately took him in to the doctor. After an MRI, the doctor suggested the family go to Omaha right away to have surgery, as there was a tumor and fluid build-up. Cayden’s tumor location does not allow it to be completely removed. After surgery, he underwent rounds of chemotherapy.

“It’s a few hours of getting medicine drained into you, and then the next few days, it feels like your mouth has a horrible taste in it. Then, you do lose some energy, and there are some muscle side effects to it,” Cayden said.

read more at www.chcne.org/lydias-story

4,600 children are diagnosed with a brain tumor annually.